Company Name : KUKA

Company Sector : Automation

Operating Geography : Germany, Europe, Global

About the Company : KUKA (Keller und Knappich Augsburg) is a German company that makes factory automation robots and solutions. Since 2016, the Midea Group of China has owned the company. The company is headquartered in Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany. In 1898, Johann Josef Keller and Jacob Knappich formed the company in Augsburg, Germany, to produce low-cost domestic and municipal lighting, household appliances, and car headlights. In 1905, the production was expanded to include cutting-edge self-contained welding tools. In the automation market, KUKA Systems provides regular and customised industrial production automation solutions, including joining technologies and part handling. Before development, the technologies are thoroughly tested and the manufacturing processes are completely optimised. KUKA Systems also provides engineering and individual counselling, allowing customized/special production solution to be designed and optimised in collaboration with the client. Material processing, machine loading and unloading palletizing and depalletizing, and spot and arc welding are only a few of the applications for industrial robots. On 12 April 2021, at the digital Hannover Messe, KUKA presented the first elements of its future operating system, iiQKA.OS. The new operating system would serve as the foundation for an entire ecosystem, allowing users to access a diverse set of components, applications, apps, utilities, and equipment that are simple to set up, run, and use to improve the system.

KUKA's Unique Selling Point or USP lies in it being one of the world's leading automation specialists, providing a wide range of products and services from a single source to customers in a variety of industries: from robot components to manufacturing cells, turnkey systems, and networked production using cloud-based IT software. KUKA's mission statement reads, " To create unique solutions through the interaction of expertise in different areas".
